ANNOUNCEMENT

With the publication of this catalog, the Division of Visual Instruction announces the resumption of the lending of wall pictures, which was interrupted three years ago because of the losses resulting from the Capitol fire of 1911. The University first undertook such a means of encouraging art education as early as 1896. The benefits that have been derived from this form of State aid are shown in part by the numerous excellent photographic reproductions of the world's great paintings, sculpture and architecture now to be seen in most of the secondary schools of the State. Doubtless the influence of the collection might be traced also to many homes where house decoration has come to show a more refined taste, and likewise to the keener appreciation and enjoyment of beauty by many individuals who within the past eighteen years have had an opportunity thus to become familiar with a certain number of the works of noted artists through such reproductions.

The present loan collection is necessarily incomplete, but is fairly representative of different classes of subjects and schools of artists. It is smaller than the former collection, but on the whole much better in quality and more varied in subjects. Since the first purchases were made, nearly twenty years ago, the number of works offered in good reproductions has been extended to a wider range of subjects and a higher standard of excellence has been established for the collection as well as for the schools.

The whole number of pictures now in the collection is 555; the number of subjects represented is 285. As there are nearly 1000 high schools and about 10,500 common district schools in this State entitled to borrow, it is apparent that the collection can not serve the purpose of supplying all these schools continuously with wall pictures; nor should this be the purpose of the collection. Observation tells us that in most cases a school is not disposed to rely altogether upon the State collection. When a temporary loan has been recalled, the pictures are missed to such an extent that the school finds some means of securing for its permanent possession equally good ones with which to decorate what would otherwise be unattractive walls.

The loan collection first of all stimulates an interest in a refined decoration of schoolrooms; in the second place, it does something to familiarize the schools with pleasing and appropriate subjects; and third, it establishes a standard of excellence in quality for the guidance of those about to purchase.

The list here given should not, however, be regarded quite as a recommended list. Many other subjects would be added if funds permitted. A few would not be purchased again. Certain of the publications listed are not of the best quality, but were already in the collection and may be of too much service to warrant discarding them. In some cases the framing is not entirely satisfactory. Yet on the whole the collection is a superior one, and a school about to make purchases will, it is hoped, find helpful suggestions in the list and in the pictures themselves.

In acting upon applications for loans, the aim hereafter will be perhaps even more than formerly to judge as well as possible the opportunity there is of influencing through the loan the action of the community in the matter of providing permanently for more pleasing, tastefully decorated schoolrooms, corridors and grounds.

Along with the benefits of this loan collection are to be counted those growing out of the careful work of the Division in passing upon applications for the approval of reproductions of standard works of art as the basis of an apportionment of State money to cover one-half the cost of such reproductions. The loan collection and these apportionments must be made so far as possible to work together. From $15,000 to $18,000 worth of wall pictures are being approved each year and the amount is likely to be increased.

By a recent modification of the statute governing apportionments from the academic fund, a common district school may receive aid in providing good reproductions of standard works of art. Such a school may also share in the benefits of the loan collection.

For regulations governing loans and also apportionments of money, see the latest edition of Handbook 31.

THE STUDY OF REPRODUCTIONS OF STANDARD WORKS OF ART AND SCHOOLROOM DECORATION

Art as a field of study. Art is one of the large fields of study. It easily takes rank with literature. Knowledge of Rembrandt, Michelangelo and St Gaudens is as much an evidence of culture as knowledge of Shakspeare, Dante and Bryant. The ability to appreciate good painting, sculpture or architecture affords as much genuine satisfaction as the ability to read poetry, fiction or drama.

The school may as properly encourage and aid the study of one as of the other. Thirty years ago the subject of drawing began to be somewhat generally introduced into the schools of New York State. At first it was confined largely to a study of type solids and drawing from copies, but the scope of the course has been steadily enlarged in the direction of art appreciation and practical design. In literature the emphasis has of late been placed upon the importance of making pupils familiar with representative literary works through appreciative reading of them. So in art there is need of more study of the world's great examples of created beauty in form, color and design. For most persons, study with a view to an appreciation of art is worth more than efforts to produce.

It is now possible through excellent photographic reproductions to teach art to classes in the elementary and secondary schools. Good schoolroom decoration is one of the direct means of doing this, and boards of education should be as prompt and earnest in making schoolrooms pleasing in appearance and in decorating them with good reproductions of standard works of art as in equipping laboratories and providing libraries.

The study of pictures. Pupils should be trained to read pictures. Painting is a mode of expression; the artist by means of paint and brush is telling a story, describing a scene or a person or presenting some thought or idea. Teachers should endeavor to interpret the picture.

Pupils should describe what they see, noting details and discovering their significance. How many persons have looked at the picture of the Gleaners, by Millet, a hundred times and yet could tell nothing more about it than that three peasant women are bending over to pluck the stray stalks of grain. True, this is the dominant interest in the painting but the artist had a purpose in putting into his picture the busy scene in the background — the overseer on horseback and many people at work.

Even younger pupils should be trained to see all there is in a picture but should not attempt art criticism. They should associate with the picture its title and the artist's name. Of course it will be necessary in most cases for a teacher to make some explanations or give some facts that will add interest to a picture. For instance, children will enjoy the portrait of Baby Stuart as a picture of a baby in a queer cap and holding a ball but it will increase the interest if they are told that the picture is that of a baby called James who afterward became the King of England.

In the intermediate grades something of the artist's life and character may be taught, particularly such facts as will contribute in any way to an understanding of the painting studied. For example, Landseer's love for animals; Reynold's fondness for little girls.

Older pupils may profitably make a comparative study of the works of an artist or of different artists, note the common characteristics of the several works of an artist and the class of subjects painted, and become familiar with simple points of technic, illustrating general principles of the school course in art.

The aim in all this should be to arouse interest in art, to develop power to appreciate beauty and to establish the attitude of mental response to the many beautiful things that are daily presented to every person, whatever his walk in life may be. Some specific facts must be known, and there are many advantages in being able to state in well-chosen words what one sees in a work of art and why one enjoys it, but the essential thing is that one shall acquire the ability to appreciate for the sake of gratifying the higher feelings.

What has been said above with special reference to painting applies in spirit also to sculpture, architecture and the applied arts.

Schoolroom decoration. It is not enough to provide pictures for the schoolroom walls and to study them. The choice of them and their arrangement on the walls are also matters of importance in realizing their full educational value.

The schoolroom wall should be considered as furnishing a problem in space division, and pictures should be placed on it with a proper regard for the principles that govern such composition.

Some of the principles of art that should be applied to the selection and placement of a picture for a given space are the following: fitness — the appropriateness of the picture in shape, size and character; harmony — a pleasing relation to its surroundings; balance — a sense of equilibrium or repose; variety — avoiding a monotonous or stiff arrangement.

A picture should hang. It should have space all around it. Therefore it should not rest upon the blackboard or other object. But it should not be so high as to appear "skied." Pictures on the school wall should not appear crowded, that is, they should not be too large for the spaces in which they hang nor placed too close to one another. On the other hand, a small picture on a large space is not at all satisfactory.

The character of the picture, the distance at which it is generally seen, the height of the ceiling and the available space for pictures must all be determining factors in the placing of pictures.

Pictures that have large masses and strong outlines, that is, good "carrying" power, may be placed higher than pictures with small figures, fine detail or weak lines. Pictures of the latter type should so far as possible be hung where they will generally be viewed at close range.

The division will be more pleasing if the spaces above and below the picture are unequal.

In determining the position for a picture, try it at different heights and in different places until the right spot seems to have been found. It is said that Whistler, when placing in a painting the butterfly used as a monogram, would try it in many different positions, erasing it each time, until he found the exact spot where it would best fit into the composition.

A picture should be hung by two wires, for the vertical lines thus formed are more in harmony with the lines of a room and are less conspicuous than the lines of a wire converging at or near the ceiling. Furthermore the picture is more secure and less likely to slip and hang crooked.

Avoid putting the screw eyes too low, for the picture will then tip forward at too great an angle. The screw eyes should not be more than one-third of the distance from the top and probably as a rule not so low as that. A picture, unless hung rather high and seen at close range, should tip out only very little at the top.

As a teacher begins to provide good reproductions of works of artistic merit, the cheap, taudry pictures and other worthless objects that have found their way into the schoolroom from time to time will be removed and the character of the room will be entirely changed.

An orderly arrangement of whatever is in the room is an essential element in good decoration. No teacher can consistently conduct exercises in drawing, involving studies in balance, harmony and rhythm, in a schoolroom whose very walls are constantly a gross violation of the principles to be taught. Instruction under such conditions must be regarded as merely formal and without purpose or appreciation.
